Stalking:

A Too Often Undetected Tactic of Intimate Partner Violence

Stalking impacts 1 in 3 women and 1 in 6 men in the United States. Nearly half of stalking offenders are current or former intimate partners. All stalkers can be dangerous, but current/former intimate partners are generally more threatening, violent, and interfering than other stalkers and may stalk their victims before, during, and/or after the relationship.

This conference will highlight the significant connections between stalking and intimate partner violence, assist professionals in the field with how to identify and respond to stalking, and address recent trends on the use of technology to perpetrate stalking.

SPARC

Join us as we welcome Natalie Ivey from SPARC: Stalking Prevention Awareness and Resource Center of Aequitas. SPARC is a federally funded resource organization with a mission to educate the professionals tasked with keeping stalking victims safe and holding offenders accountable. Alongside Natalie Ivey from SPARC, we are also thankful to welcome Anna Nasset. Anna Nasset is an international speaker and writer on the subject of stalking, Anna speaks openly about her experience as a survivor of intimate partner stalking and her perpetrator received one of the longest known sentences for stalking in United States history.
